Introduction

MicroLAND™ will be a multi-person interactive simulation of an imaginary alternate world. The simulation will be spread over a number of personal computers connected together with a local area network (LAN). Each computer will simulate a particular region of the world. Collectively, the whole network of machines simulates the entire world. A player sits at each computer which acts as his window on the world. The player can then interact directly with the local simulation and indirectly, by means of the LAN, with the simulations being run on other machines. Interaction with remote machines, either by entering their simulations or by having their players enter the simulation on your machine, can involve interaction with the other players as well.
